Leading library, archives, and museum organisations call on WIPO to help safeguard cultural heritage

In the present scenario of crises such as COVID-19, the long-term global threat of climate change cannot be forget. In order to safeguard global cultural heritage, IFLA and its partners have come together to call on governments and the World Intellectual Property Organization not to forget the past. An open letter calling for action to ensure that intellectual property laws do not stand in the way of preservation of heritage faced with climate change already has 155 organisational and institutional co-signatories, and 55 individuals. The letter is still open for signatories. April 26 is World Intellectual Property Day, established by the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) to publicize how copyright, patents, trademarks, and designs affect the world. Their focus this year is on innovating towards a "green future."

Barber Runs a library inside his Salon

P.Ponmariappana hairdresser at Millerpuram in Tuticorin, is a dropout from school but his determination was to inculcate reading habits among youth. Ponmariappan, 38, could not study beyond Class VIII due to poverty. He set up a saloon after he dropped out of school and he has a collection of over 800 books. 30% discount is offered to customers.

He also set up an audio system in his shop, in which he played speeches by renowned Tamil orators, including SugiSivam, Nellai Kannan, TamilaruviManian and BharathiBaskar.

Ponmariappan set up his collection six years ago with 250 books, now he has about 850 books.

73-year-old librarian in Kerala walks 4 km every day to promote reading

In today's digital pro world where social media prevails over print documents reading habits especially among the youth. A Seventy-three-year-old woman

Umadevi Antharjanam worked hard to inculcate the declining practice of book reading habits by distributing books. Over the past 14 years she walks four-five kilometres every day to promote reading habits and has visited more than 220 houses in Budhannor Village in Kerala. She asks children to tell her what they learnt from the books when she goes back to collect them after a couple of weeks. With people having known Umadevi for over a decade, they now call her to let her know about which books they or their family members want to read.

New Age Libraries: Where to?

The future is a matter of concern for all of us. E-books and E-library will become dominant and librarians have no option than to promote the best possible ways to access information globally. In the present environment many new learning patterns have been emerged. Online education has become the reality of the day. For imparting online education- lot of modules have been developed and used successfully. Almost all educational institutions including schools & universities have started online teaching & training of their courses for their students. I say that the role of libraries as centres of inclusive access to information is crucial. It is essential that libraries must play advocacy role and contribute to new initiative and reconsider the use of online education/teaching tools including social media to disseminate scholar's works, share their information resources and making available low cost open data resources.

I believe that libraries can contribute to common sustainable development, if new technologies are embraced as a means of providing access to free knowledge and repositioning libraries vis-a-vis their users by introducing new services and products, building alliances with other organizations and interacting with users for meeting their complex information needs. According to IFLA's Development and Access to Information Report 2017, the libraries are key actors towards fulfilling their commitment to promote meaningful access to information and provide online education to information campaigners including academic & research organizations.

It is clear from the ITU's Measuring the Information Society Report 2017, that another digital revolution is approaching - one which transform business, government and society. Four key developments are heart of this revolution: the internet of things (IOT), cloud computing, big data analytics, and artificial intelligence (AI). No doubt, all these above new developments will greatly expand the digital footprint.

To take forward this endeavour, new professional skills are required to satisfy the complex information needs of the society using new technologies. Library professionals must always keen to explore further means of co-operation by which we could contribute to the knowledge society at large.
